Why does the job exist?

This position is responsible for supporting the region and its communities to address health issues through the development of health policies, supporting community coalitions, boards, local planning councils to address health concerns, and implementing special projects and/or grants that address health priorities in communities. This may involve direct patient health education, group education/training, community coalition building, group facilitation, contract, and grant management and/or community coalition support.

How does it get done?

Health Promotion work is concentrated on population health looking at changes impacting groups of people in communities where they live, work, play and age. Health Promotion Teams strengthen collaborative efforts at the local level to provide health councils and community partners with data, technical assistance and other resources at the request of local communities. The position is responsible to assure coordination of local community health improvement activities by assessing community readiness; raising awareness on identified health issues; including the provision of and interpretation of data; identifying appropriate local partners; including partners in planning and implementation of state initiatives; and facilitating communication between local, region and state entities.

Who are the customers?

County and tribal communities in Santa Fe, Rio Arriba, Los Alamos, Taos, Colfax, Union, Harding, Mora, San Miguel and Guadalupe counties.
